

Ex-Carillion bosses paid to clean up own mess 'disgusting'

The botched work of Carillion left a brand-new hospital with structural issues & dangerous cladding

Senior figures from collapsed contractor Carillion who were involved in the building of the failed new Royal Liverpool Hospital are now being paid by the public to assist in helping to finish off the project.

After Carillion's collapse last year it was discovered three out of the 11 floors of the new build needed strengthening due to structural issues leaving the unsafe.

Cladding also used by Carillion on the building has also been deemed unsafe.

Carillion collapse: the dangers of outsourcing

Michael Evans, GMB Regional Organiser, said:

“The fact senior people involved in this mess are being rewarded for their failure and are now being paid to fix it is disgusting.”
